FORT MONROE GOES TO THE MOVIES (Part One)

During the early years of the 20th century, many Americans discovered a new form of entertainment called motion pictures. From 1913-1919 film programs were regularly shown at the Fort Monroe YMCA Building, but obviously a much larger facility was needed. A new structure to be called the Liberty Theater was designated for a small piece of the 25 acres of new landfill created along Mill Creek during World War I.

The new theater was scheduled to open on Feb. 21, 1920, with General John J. Pershing in attendance, but a recurrent bout of influenza postponed that event until March 7, the day on which the first Chamberlin Hotel was destroyed by fire. Although primarily a movie house, the Liberty also hosted band concerts, holiday pageants, boxing matches, and plays on Sunday nights. This was possible when theatrical road companies were able to do one-night stands at Fort Monroe between engagements in Richmond and Norfolk. In fact, the Liberty's first presentation was a stage comedy, Tumble In.

This theater was a large wooden structure with a circular dome and 2300 seats. It was an important social outlet, especially during the eight years when Old Point Comfort lacked a resort hotel. The Liberty was also caught up in the chaotic transition from silent to talking pictures.

By the mid-1930s, the once-proud showplace was looking a bit threadbare, so plans were made for a more modern replacement. Ground was broken in November 1937 for the Fort Monroe Theatre, though it would not open for another year. The Liberty Theater closed its doors for good on May 7, 1939, after a performance of Petticoat Fever by local thespians. The building was demolished in November 1939. (To be continued next month)

FORT MONROE AND CADET COMMAND

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) that we know today was not fully established until 1916 with the passage of the National Defense Act. It set about standardizing collegiate instruction in military training. At Fort Monroe the first camp was in 1919 with approximately 60 cadets. In May 1931, the 51st Coast Artillery Regiment was sent to Fort Monroe with a secondary mission to assist in the training of ROTC cadets. During the final camp in 1941, Fort Monroe had 370 cadets in attendance.

In 1948, the Selective Service Act passed and growth in ROTC commissioning continued. By 1953, ROTC was the largest source of Army officers. The ROTC Vitalization Act of 1964 improved training but did not provide adequate command and control. ROTC programs struggled to meet the Army's needs during the Vietnam War. In the 1973 post-Vietnam Army reorganization the Army placed ROTC under the newly formed Training and Doctrine Command (TRADOC) at Fort Monroe and split ROTC into four regions, each with their own leadership chain resulting in little to no uniformity or standardization in training.

TRADOC established a new command - U.S. Army Cadet Command on April 15, 1986, with a ceremony in Continental Park at Fort Monroe on May 2nd (see photo). For the first time in its history, ROTC had a strong command and control structure and standardized training throughout the program. Cadet Command brought together 300 college-level ROTC units and 800 Junior ROTC programs. The way cadets were recruited, selected, and trained emphasized the importance of quality in training the individual. ROTC officers produced by Cadet Command were fully prepared and capable, as proven during the Persian Gulf War.

For 40 years Cadet Command has been at the forefront of commissioning officers into the Army. Today, it continues to commission the largest number of active and reserve officers into the Army.

THE TOM MIX SAGA, PART 2

In October 1902, 1st Sergeant Tom Mix deserted from his post at Fort Hancock, New Jersey, to save his marriage to Grace Allin of Norfolk. However, her father objected to having a felon for a son-in-law and managed to have the union annulled. Fortunately for Tom, the U.S. Army never made any serious attempt to arrest him at that time and later forgot about his offense. Tom was free to add four more wives to his biography,

After several years of drifting around the Southwest, he finally found his true calling in Southern California. In 1909 he began working in the film industry as a stunt rider and then as an actor. By the early 1920s he was a highly paid star with the Fox Film Corporation. Unlike his Western rival William S. Hart, Tom wasn't interested in authenticity—his movies sometimes made use of airplanes and automobiles. His famous horse Tony often received equal billing.

In 1933 Tom allowed the use of his name in a children's radio program, The Tom Mix Straight Shooters, although he never appeared on the show. In fact, each episode ended with the announcement that “Tom Mix is impersonated.” Two years later, in his mid-fifties, he made his final film, a low-budget serial entitled The Miracle Rider.

On October 12, 1940, after visiting friends in Tucson, Tom drove north in his prized 1937 Cord Phaeton (see photo) at excessive speeds. Near Florence, Arizona, he made a wrong turn and came upon a bridge undergoing repairs. He hit the brakes and lost control of the convertible, which left the highway and turned over. It is believed that a heavy metal suitcase stowed in the back seat flew forward, smashing into the back of his head and possibly breaking his neck. He was sixty years old. Ironically, the radio program that bore his name continued to be broadcast until 1951.

A MOVIE STAR STATIONED AT FORT MONROE?

Most silent film actors are now long forgotten, but cowboy star Tom Mix is one of the rare exceptions. Even people who have never seen any of his films recognize the name, but how many of them know that Mix spent part of his Army enlistment at Fort Monroe?

Thomas Hezekiah Mix was born on January 6, 1880, in Mix Run, Pennsylvania, a considerable distance from the Wild West. However, his love of horses developed from an early age, so his riding and roping skills (unlike most “facts” in his official studio biography) were genuine.

In April 1898 Mix enlisted in the U.S. Army, no doubt anxious to fight in the War with Spain. That conflict ended rather abruptly and, contrary to some accounts, the young soldier was never involved in any combat situations overseas. On April 13, 1899, 1st Sergeant Tom Mix arrived at Fort Monroe to join the newly created Battery O, 4th Artillery Regiment. On June 24, 1900, he and his unit were transferred to Fort Hancock, New Jersey. Tom reenlisted in April 1901 with the 48th Company, Coast Artillery Corps (see group photo, 1st Sgt. Mix front and center).

Tom found himself back at Fort Monroe in 1902 for summer training with the 48th Company. During that stay, he began a whirlwind courtship with a Norfolk girl, Grace Allin, and married her on July 18, 1902. For reasons unknown, Grace remained in Norfolk after Tom returned to Fort Hancock but let him know that long-distance marriage did not suit her. On October 20, 1902, Tom left his duty station on a five-day furlough and never returned. What happened? (To be continued)

FORT MONROE TROOPS IN TEXAS??

After ruling Mexico since 1876, President Porfirio Diaz announced that he would not run for another term in 1910 but then changed his mind and imprisoned his main rival, Francisco Madero, who called for an armed insurrection to oust Diaz. When clashes occurred between his supporters and the Federales near the U.S. border, President William Howard Taft authorized sending reinforcements to Texas.

At Fort Monroe the 6th, 35th, 41st, 69th, and 73rd Companies, Coast Artillery Corps, were ordered to participate in this action. On March 11, 1911, they assembled at the Old Point Comfort wharf (see photo) and boarded the Army troop transport Kilpatrick for a voyage around the Florida Keys and across the Gulf of Mexico to Galveston. From there they moved to nearby Fort Crockett, a Coast Artillery installation, and set up a tent camp.

These companies now formed the bulk of the 2nd Provisional Regiment, which would function as an infantry unit if needed at or across the border with Mexico

(which was a considerable distance away). Therefore, these heavy artillery gunners would spend most of their time training to become foot soldiers. The weather was not always cooperative and often turned their campground into a muddy field.

Fortunately, tensions in Mexico eased dramatically after Diaz resigned and was replaced by an interim government. The Fort Monroe companies were released from this temporary duty and departed from Galveston on board the transport Sumner. They arrived at Old Point Comfort on July 10, 1911, having completed their mission without firing a shot.
