

Another Way: Jerome

I've personally recovered pamphlets in the possession of suspected cult members describing our treasured traditions, passed down to us by our ancestors, as murderous and barbaric. The rhetoric urges the reader to not only turn their backs on the colony and all we stand for, but to also bring as many with them as they can. It's unfortunate the way in which ideas can become poison, and how we can infect one another with the disease of self-destructive perspectives. Those perspectives grow legs, and eyes, and ears, and mouths, and become living, breathing beliefs, and those beliefs—regardless of their validity—are what we live, kill, and die for.

- Sean Aeon

