

Crucial Voices:

The Importance of Representation in Public Institutional Leadership

RSVP TO JOIN US IN REAL LIFE OR ENGAGE ONLINE

Online Live: via TEAMS, Join link will be provided upon registration submission

In-Person: School of Creative Arts Armouries Building, 37 University Avenue East
(entrance at the double doors located on Freedom Way, east side of building)

Friday, February 10, 7 p.m. - 9 p.m.

The Interdisciplinary and Critical Studies Department at the University of Windsor is proud to present this public panel discussion, tackling the question of exclusion from public institutional leadership.

How can our leaders look and see things so differently from communities in a working democracy? What are the ways in which gender, class, migration status, language, race, and other attributes of people in our community are used to exclude them (or include them) from decision-making?

Why is this so important for our present—and for our future?

The panel will be moderated by Jane Ku, associate professor of women's and gender studies and sociology at the University of Windsor, and panel participants include Cheryl Collier, professor of political science and dean of the Faculty of Arts, Humanities and Social Science; Ronjon Paul Datta, associate professor of sociology; Natalie Delia Deckard, associate professor of criminology and director of the Black Studies Institute; Emmanuelle Richez, associate professor of political science; and Mita Williams, acting law librarian.

