Indie Pop artist Tamar Berk shares “your permission”

Today, indie pop singer, songwriter, and multi-instrumentalist Tamar Berk has released the lead single from her upcoming sophomore album Start At The End, titled “your permission”. This new single is the first new music from Tamar since her full length album from 2021, The Restless Dreams Of Youth, which was just nominated for album of the year and best pop album at the San Diego Music Awards.

Today, the indie pop singer, songwriter, and multi-instrumentalist Tamar Berk has released “Tragic Endings”, the second single from her upcoming sophomore solo album Start At The End. “Tragic Endings”, like previous single “your permission” (which was featured on NPR’s New Music Friday playlist) starts out relatively simple and paired back in its arrangement, before building up the energy and layers of instrumentation into an anthemic chorus that shows off the dynamic range of Tamar, whose style bridges the gap between piano driven indie pop ala Regina Spektor and harder rocking power-pop / indie rock of artists like Soccer Mommy or Liz Phair.

Indie Pop artist Tamar Berk shares new album Start at The End next week (4/22)

Start At The End is the follow-up to her excellent 2021 solo debut The Restless Dreams Of Youth, which was recently nominated for album of the year and best pop album at the San Diego Music Awards. Tamar is a veteran power-pop and psych-rock bands from the 90s and 2000s like Starball, with releases on cult indie labels like Thick Records, Minty Fresh and Kill Rock Star, with her two solo releases specializing in a particular blend of accessible yet personal indie pop and rock that should be familiar to fans of singer songwriters from the 90s and 2000's like Juliana Hatfield and Regina Spektor.
