#505 - PREVENTING AND TREATING NERVE INJURIES IN DENTAL PRACTICE

Nerve injuries are a significant yet preventable complication in dental care, particularly during extractions, implant placement, endodontic procedures, and local anesthesia administration. This course equips dental professionals with the knowledge and clinical strategies needed to minimize the risk of nerve injuries and effectively manage them when they occur.

Learning Objectives

- Identify the most commonly affected oral and maxillofacial nerves in dental procedures, including the inferior alveolar, lingual, mental, and infraorbital nerves.
- Recognize patient-related, anatomical, and procedural risk factors that increase the likelihood of nerve injury.
- Apply evidence-based prevention strategies during local anesthesia administration, surgical extractions, implant placement, and endodontic treatment.
- Differentiate between types of nerve injuries (neuropraxia, axonotmesis, neurotmesis) and their clinical presentations.
- Implement early diagnostic and management protocols for patients presenting with altered sensation, pain, or paresthesia.
- Develop appropriate treatment plans, including pharmacologic management, monitoring, referral timing, and patient communication.

Dr. Joel Berger was born in Montreal, Canada, where he earned both his bachelor and dental degrees from McGill University. After earning his dental degree, he spent an additional year in advanced dental training at the McGill Graduate School of Dentistry. He subsequently earned his medical degree at the University of Washington. After completing his degree, he entered the oral and maxillofacial surgery training program at the University of Washington, where he completed general surgery and oral and maxillofacial training. He spent one year in Europe doing a fellowship at two major centers, one in Holland and one in Austria. He then returned to McGill University for an additional year of advanced training prior to coming to San Diego.
