State, coal firm trying to settle pollution charges

The Courier-Journal Bureau

FRANKFORT, Ky.—The State Department for Natural Resources and Environmental Protection and Grays Knob Coal Co. of Harlan County are trying to negotiate a settlement of the state's charges against the company for allegedly discharging black water into Martin's Fork.

Joseph Zaloski, a department attorney, said yesterday that a settlement, if reached, would include a civil penalty and remedial measures.

A department hearing on eight black-water charges against the company was continued yesterday to next Friday on the department's motion because all parties are negotiating, Zaloski said.

Pending in Franklin Circuit Court are two suits filed against the department by Grays Knob. One asks the court to stop the department from prosecuting the alleged black-water violations. The other seeks to block the commission's July 29 order to suspend the company's coal-washer permit without a prior hearing.

Zaloski said that, if a settlement is not reached, the department will proceed with a hearing to prosecute all charges against the company.

Portrait of Washington marred slightly in crowd

WASHINGTON (AP)—A portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart was injured slightly during a recent White House social event.

"It's only a superficial scratch," said White House Curator Clement Conger. The portrait has three-quarter inch mark on Washington's forearm.

The painting, which the White House has had for more than 175 years, was rescued by Dolly Madison when the British were burning Washington in the War of 1812.

According to Conger, the painting was marred during a reception for hundreds of congressional summer interns. A restorer is expected to patch up the damage next week or so, Conger said.

Karsell was a special correspondent for Time, Life and Fortune magazines and also for Business Week, Collier's, Nova, Republic, Atlantic Monthly and Reporter magazine. He was a general assignment reporter for The Chicago Sun-Times and for The Indianapolis Star.
