

If zoning is silent on pay-per-hour home karaoke, it's going to get loud.

The D.I.Y. entertainment trend of opening your home to concerts, plays, and parties has come to karaoke. Check out the March 5 New York Times.

One Brooklyn couple opened “Lion’s Roar” in their living room. Rates start at $125 per hour for 10 guests or fewer. Amateur singers have fun with friends in a homey joint, not a public bar with a sticky floor.

Sure, there have been noise complaints and broken stuff. But hey.

If Barnstable officials keep allowing homes to be turned into hotels, by what logic would they object to karaoke lounges?

Get involved or get used to it.
