

TNG COMPLIANCE RADAR

September's developments highlight a growing emphasis on evidence-based compliance across the food sector. From novel food authorisations and allergen management to wider regulatory reform, businesses are increasingly expected to demonstrate the decisions, controls and risk assessments that sit behind their products and processes. As regulatory expectations evolve, maintaining clear justification and supporting evidence is becoming an essential part of compliance management.

ON THE RADAR

FSA recommends first CBD novel food authorisations

The Food Standards Agency has recommended authorisation of the first three CBD novel food applications in England and Wales. Proposed conditions include a 10mg daily intake limit and specific consumer warnings, with final decisions now resting with ministers.

Read full article

Allergen recalls reinforce importance of labelling controls

Recent FSA allergy alerts highlight the continued importance of robust allergen controls and accurate consumer information. Undeclared allergens remain a common cause of product recalls, reinforcing the need for effective label review and verification processes.

Read full article

FSA outlines future regulatory model for large food businesses

The FSA has published proposals exploring new approaches to the oversight of major food retailers, signalling a growing focus on data, assurance and regulatory oversight.

Read full article

THIS MONTH'S SIGNAL

Demonstrating compliance is becoming as important as achieving it.

Recent developments across novel foods, allergen management and regulatory reform point to a common trend: regulators increasingly expect businesses not only to comply, but to demonstrate how compliance decisions have been made and maintained.

WHAT TO WATCH NEXT

- Ministerial decisions on the proposed CBD novel food authorisations and associated conditions of use.
- Continued enforcement activity relating to allergen management and food information compliance.
- Further developments under the FSA's Future of Food Regulation Programme as proposals move towards consultation.
- Growing emphasis on evidence, documentation and demonstrable compliance systems across the food supply chain.

HOW WE SUPPORT YOU

We support food and drink businesses with regulatory compliance, ensuring products remain aligned with current legislation and evolving expectations.

If these updates resonate, we can help you assess your position and navigate next steps.