SNOW WHITE

and The Seven Dwarfs

SYNOPSIS

Act 1

The day begins with laughter deep in the forest, where the Seven Dwarfs bustle out of their little cottage. They stretch, yawn, tease one another, and tumble into a lively dance as they head off to work. Each dwarf shows their own quirks—one proud, one silly, one sleepy—but together they move with a warm, familiar rhythm that fills the woods with joy.

Not far away, Snow White spends a carefree morning with her friends. They dance through the park in soft, swirling patterns, celebrating the simple happiness of being young and surrounded by those who love her. Snow White's kindness shines in every gesture, and her gentle spirit seems to brighten the world around her.

In the palace, the Queen stands before her enchanted mirror, confident and regal. She asks the mirror if she remains the fairest in the land, and the mirror still answers yes. Satisfied, she turns away—unaware that Snow White's beauty and goodness are quietly blossoming beyond the castle walls.

As grown-up Snow White continues her joyful day, the Queen's spies bring troubling news: Snow White's beauty has surpassed her own. Fury rises within the Queen, sharp and cold. She summons the Huntswoman and commands her to take Snow White into the forest and kill her. The Huntswoman obeys outwardly, but her heart trembles.

When she leads Snow White into the woods, she cannot complete the cruel task. Snow White's innocence is too pure, too undeserving of harm. With urgency and fear, the Huntswoman begs her to flee—run far into the forest and never return to the castle. Snow White, frightened but trusting, escapes into the shadows.

The forest at first is dark and overwhelming. Strange shapes loom, branches twist, and shadows seem alive. But as Snow White moves deeper, the darkness softens. Curious woodland animals emerge, circling her with hesitant steps. They study her with wide eyes, wondering who this gentle stranger might be. Snow White's calm presence reassures them, and soon the forest begins to breathe again.

The shadows lift, revealing a world of enchantment. Snow White dances with the animals, and magical fairies appear, shimmering like living stardust. As she journeys farther, she experiences the beauty of all four seasons—spring's blossoms swirling around her, summer's warmth glowing in golden light, autumn's leaves spinning in rich colors, and winter's quiet sparkle drifting like snowflakes in the air. Each season is brought to life by its own group of fairies, each more wondrous than the last.

The forest gathers in a final burst of magic as animals and fairies join together, guiding Snow White toward a small cottage hidden among the trees. Drawn by its warmth and mystery, she steps inside, unaware that this humble home—and the friends who live there—will soon change her life forever.

The new day begins with warmth and joy inside the dwarfs' cozy cottage. Snow White wakes surrounded by her woodland friends, and soon the dwarfs join her in a cheerful morning dance. Their movements are full of character—playful, clumsy, proud, and sweet—as they enjoy her company before heading off to work. When it is time to leave, Snow White waves them goodbye as they march into the forest toward the diamond mines.

In the mines, the dwarfs' day sparkles with excitement. Jewels glimmer from every corner, and each gemstone seems to come alive in its own dazzling dance. The dwarfs work with rhythm and humor, celebrating the beauty they uncover and the joy of working together.

Back at the cottage, Snow White spends the afternoon playing with the woodland animals. Their gentle dances fill the home with life and laughter—until a knock at the door interrupts the peace. An old woman, frail and trembling, asks for a drink of water. Snow White, kind as ever, welcomes her inside. To thank her, the old woman offers a perfect red apple, shining like a jewel. Snow White takes a bite, and in an instant, she collapses into an enchanted sleep.

The old woman straightens, her disguise melting away as she transforms back into the wicked Queen. She revels in her victory—until the animals, horrified, race to warn the dwarfs. Together, dwarfs and animals chase the Queen through the forest in a fierce, fast-moving battle of courage and loyalty. Cornered at the edge of a cliff, the Queen loses her footing and falls, disappearing into the darkness below.

But even with the Queen defeated, the forest is filled with sorrow. Snow White remains motionless, and the magic of the land begins to fade. The Four Season Fairies—Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter—feel their powers weakening. Blossoms wilt, breezes still, leaves lose their color, and frost dims to pale gray. Without Snow White's light, the world cannot shine.

Determined to save her, the fairies set out into the forest. Guided by the last flicker of their magic, they discover a handsome prince traveling through the woods. They dance around him, urging him to follow, and lead him to the cottage where Snow White lies.

The prince is struck by her beauty and the sadness that fills the room. He kneels beside her, lifts her hand, and gently kisses her. The spell breaks instantly. Snow White awakens, color returns to her cheeks, and the fairies' powers burst back to life—Spring blooming, Summer glowing, Autumn swirling, Winter sparkling.

The dwarfs cheer, the animals dance, and the fairies shine brighter than ever. Snow White and the prince join hands as the entire enchanted world gathers around them. In a joyful celebration of love, hope, and the magic restored to the forest, they dance together, bringing the day to a radiant close.
