Some people are concerned about what message do beauty pageants send to young girls everywhere. Girls obsess about their weight and appearance anyway, so these competitions based on looks may emphasize that issue. We seek some sort of perfection which, in my opinion, is a very subjective thing, and cannot be defined anyway. But whatever my opinion may be on this matter, I must admit that there is more to beauty pageants that simply walking around in bikinis looking fabulous. Believe it or not, it takes more to heauty pageants, where they are asked some casual questions, but also some very serious ones too. We wrote about this topic in our previous list of 10 Political Pageant Interview Questions, where we presented some of the complex questions that contestants are faced with. They are often asked to comment current events on the political stage and express their opinion about various things. Although earlier, their personal political beliefs could remain private, that's no longer the rule so the contestants need to be contestants need to be careful what they say. This part is not very easy for the potential beauty pageants because they need to give answers which will not cause anyone to judge them or dislike them. They use anyone to judge them or dislike them. They use this opportunity to get some applause and win the audience. At times, these questions are very mainsing, raise are very mainsing, and so popular that everyone is talking about them the next day. This isn't always a positive thing though since the answers can be hilarious. It's no surprise considering how the judges can come up with some pretty confusing questions that the contestants couldn't prepare for.
