LICIA CORBELLA: VIVIAN KRAUSE QUESTIONS WHY TRUDEAU CHANGED CHARITY LAWS FOR ACTIVISTS

Why did Prime Minister Justin Trudeau order his revenue minister to stop the Canada Revenue Agency from auditing politically active charities? Was it to protect his best friend and former principal secretary, Gerald Butts?

Those are just two of the many questions being asked by Vivian Krause, the Vancouver-based researcher who has single-handedly exposed the foreign-funded campaign to “land-lock Alberta crude”, into which Alberta Premier Jason Kenney vows to hold a public inquiry. Ms. Krause has documented about US$600 million from U.S. foundations to Canadian environmental groups to “demarket” Canadian oil and gas.

Now she has turned her attention to how questions surrounding CRA audits of political charities in Canada that “go right to the office of our prime minister”. When the current government came to office (in 2015), Prime Minister Trudeau characterized these audits as ‘political harassment’ in his mandate letter to the Minister of National Revenue. The finalization of the political activity audits was suspended by the Canada Revenue Agency.

Ms. Krause has testified before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance about changes made by the Trudeau government to the income tax act with regard to charities. The main changes to the legislation are the removal of restrictions on the extent to which charities are allowed to engage in political activities.

SUSPICIOUSLY, seven days after she testified, the CRA eliminated the online access to more than one million tax returns. Every single tax return for every single registered charity for 14 years. All that historical data is gone.
Only the five most recent years remain online.

With an election coming up this fall, a lot of this goes right to the prime minister's office. Trudeau suspended all the political activity audits and then changed the law retroactively. One of the findings the CRA reported was serious noncompliance unrelated to political activity, including an ‘undue benefit’.

For example, Gerald Butts voluntarily retired as President of the World Wildlife Fund - Canada after only four years to run Trudeau’s successful 2015 federal election campaign and received a retiring payment of almost $400,000 from a charity! The World Wildlife Fund - Canada supported the “Tar Sands Campaign”, a US funded campaign to “land lock Alberta oil”. Does that smell just a little bit?

Some of these charities and individuals have very close involvement with the Office of the Prime Minister and his former principal secretary, Butts. The ending of these audits raises serious questions that merit answers. Many of the same U.S. foundations that have spent hundreds of millions of dollars successfully blocking Canadian energy pipelines to tidewater also funded groups that helped Trudeau win the 2015 election.

Krause has shown that foreign money “moved the needle” for the Liberals in the 2015 federal election campaign, with groups claiming credit for defeating 26 Conservative incumbents. These foreign funded groups, such as OPEN and Leadnow, pumped millions of dollars into Canada’s federal election, a dangerous loophole in Canadian law that the Trudeau government refuses to close. Leadnow admitted that it received foreign funding before the 2015 election but claims that money was not used in its Vote Together campaign to defeat the Harper Conservative government.

This was done as part of the campaign to land lock Alberta’s crude and to defeat the one political party (the Conservatives) that was committed to breaking the American monopoly that’s keeping our country over a barrel.

This foreign funding campaign was aimed at Alberta’s oil and the proposed pipelines to take it to market. There was no campaign against Texas. Both Canada and Alberta need these questions answered!
