NEW PUBLICATION BY AUTHOR VINCENT M MONTELEONE

Returning to his roots in the entertainment industry, Vincent M Monteleone has written a funny, poignant and often laugh out loud tale of an uncle who goes rogue and spills the family secrets he swore to keep. His character, Frank Bellincioni, tells his great nephew, Michael, that the squeaky clean boring family he was born into was anything but when he was his age. Frank takes Michael on a ride through the 1960s when the family made their move from Chicago to suburbia, bringing all their illicit dealings with them. Michael is shocked to learn of the family's connection to the Mafia, weed, money laundering and of course, sex in the peace and love decade.

His no holds barred style works exceptionally well in this book. The characters reactions to the folly he puts them through seem perfectly natural. The reader is easily taken in when he describes life as a five year old surrounded by a plethora of wacky characters through his journey from childhood to high school.

Though the book is fiction you actually get the feeling you either know, knew or have heard about these characters. His years in the industry serve him well as he creates moments of hilarious disasters. One could easily see a number of these stories in a situation comedy.

About Vincent M Monteleone:

After years of working behind the scenes in the entertainment industry, Vincent has made the transition to center stage. He has worked with actors, screenwriters and other members of film and television's creative teams on the financial segments of the business since the 1990s. Friendships grew and drawing on his early years of performing and writing for the theatre, he would offer insight and suggestions for the creative side of the projects they were involved with. More and more he found himself helping solve script problems and adding new situations to their work.

During this time he was constantly asked, "Why don't you write again?" He decided to follow their advice and "I Hope Personalities Aren't Hereditary" is the result.
