

Even the clouds floating in the sky each have their own names. Once, I had the opportunity to show a guest pastor around various places in this area. Looking up at the sky, he taught me about them, saying, "That cloud is such-and-such, and this cloud is such-and-such." The only cloud I knew back then was the cumulus cloud—the big, puffy ones that look like cotton candy. Yet, this pastor was well-versed in the various names of clouds, such as cirrus (feather clouds) and altocumulus (sheep clouds). It made me realize not only how deeply knowledgeable he was in so many fields, but also how truly diverse the types of clouds in the sky really are.

When you stay inside a building all day, you have no way of knowing what is happening outside. While looking around the church, I heard a strange sound coming from the roof. Curious about what it was, I opened the back door of the church and found a heavy rain pouring down, pattering loudly against the ground. Although I had heard it might rain, I never imagined it would be this intense. Soon after, however, this rain also ceased, and I watched the bright sunlight break through once again.

Afterward, as I sat back down and looked at my computer monitor, a news article caught my eye, reporting that Arizona had been hit by massive hail and flash floods. Looking further into it, I saw images of rivers overflowing to the point where water reached over bridges, and cars riddled with holes after being struck by golf-ball-sized hail. This was the situation in the area near Flagstaff. It was simply astonishing to realize that the rain, which had passed as a brief shower in the area where I currently live, had escalated into such a torrential downpour in the northern region that it caused rivers to overflow and flood.

So, I rolled up the window shutters and looked outside. In the sky, cirrus clouds were stretching out long and thin. While they are grateful clouds that block the scorching sun at times, it suddenly occurred to me that those very clouds could gather to pour down heavy rain and cause devastating floods.

Though I am living a comfortable life right now, another world is moving in places beyond my sight. People there are living through their own fierce struggles, and some must be enduring great pain amidst various hardships and environments. I feel as though I can almost hear their cries rising from the contrasting miseries of our world—from war, famine, and drought.
