James Picerno jpicerno@themilwaukeecompany.com

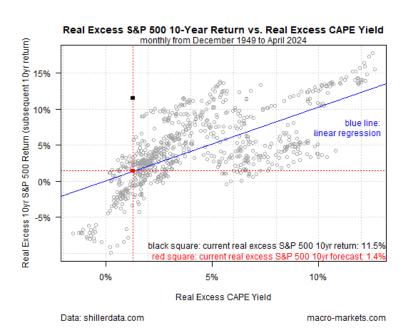

May 29, 2024

S&P 500 10-Year Real Excess Return Forecast Near Lowest Level In Over 70 Years

Key Points:

- The outlook for the stock market's inflation-adjusted (real) 10-year excess return (equities less bonds) is near the lowest level for the past 70-plus years.<sup>1</sup>
- Although there's no guarantee that the model's forecast will be correct, the ex ante estimate suggests that performance for the US stock market will be conspicuously lower over the next decade compared with the past 10 years.
- A key factor in the model's relatively low equity market forecast is linked to the dramatic rise in rolling 10-year performance numbers for the S&P 500 in recent years compared with its long-run history.

Ben Graham, the father of modern analysis, securities famously observed: "In the short run, the market is a voting machine, but in the long run, it is a weighing machine." By that he meant that the collective mood (driven emotion, speculation, rumor and other transitory factors) dominates market behavior in the short run. By contrast, over longer periods, the crowd tends to price securities in line with fundamentals, such as earnings, cash flow and other factors that determine the true worth of equities. As a result, periodically evaluating the stock market's outlook via fundamentals is a practical tool for developing strategic perspective on asset allocation and other aspects of portfolio design and management. On that basis, a review of current conditions implies that US equities face stronger headwinds relative to recent history.

Using a regression model that compares the real excess CAPE yield against the real excess 10-year S&P 500 return implies that the US stock market will earn a relatively modest premium over its equivalent for US bonds in the decade ahead.<sup>2</sup> The current 1.4% annualized real excess return forecast equates with the 15th percentile vs. realized performance in the post-World War II era. Note, too, that the realized 10-year real excess return for the S&P (through April 2024) is dramatically higher at 11.5%, a risk factor of its own vis-à-vis reversion to the mean dynamics.

Although caution is always warranted for estimating future market returns, the combination of a comparatively low point forecast and an unusually wide gap between current realized performance and the current ex ante outlook suggests that expectations for US stocks should be trimmed relative to the past decade.

<sup>1</sup> The real excess S&P 500 annualized return is based on calculations published at shillerdata.com, a web site run by Robert Shiller, a professor of economics at Yale University. The data reflects real performance of the S&P 500 Index less the equivalent for US bonds.

<sup>2</sup> The excess CAPE Yield (ECY) is calculated as the CAPE yield less the real US 10-year Treasury yield. CAPE (cyclically adjusted price-to-earnings ratio), a.k.a. the Shiller P/E, is defined as the S&P 500 Index divided by the average of ten years of earnings and adjusting for inflation (Consumer Price Index).

This Report is provided for informational and educational purposes only and is not intended to be, and should not be construed as, financial or investment advice. The views and opinions expressed in this commentary are solely those of the authors and do not necessarily reflect the official policy or position of The Milwaukee Company.

Investors are urged to consult with their own financial advisors before making any investment decisions. The information contained in this commentary has been compiled from sources believed to be reliable, but no representation or warranty, express or implied, is made as to its accuracy, completeness, or correctness. Market data and trends are subject to rapid change and may become unreliable for various reasons, including changes in market conditions or economic circumstances.

Past performance is not indicative of future results. All investments involve risks, including the possible loss of principal. No representation or warranty is made that any return or performance indicated will be achieved.

Nothing in this commentary constitutes legal, accounting, or tax advice or individually tailored investment advice. This material is prepared for general circulation and may have been prepared without regard to the individual financial circumstances and objectives of persons who receive it. The investments or services mentioned may not be suitable for all investors, and it is recommended that you consult an independent investment advisor if you have any doubts about the suitability of such investments or services for your needs.

This commentary may contain forward-looking statements, which are based on assumptions and subject to risks and uncertainties. Actual outcomes may differ materially from those expressed or implied in any forward-looking statements due to various factors.

To the fullest extent permitted by law, neither The Milwaukee Company nor any of its affiliates, nor any other person, accepts any liability whatsoever for any direct or consequential loss arising from any use of this communication or the information contained herein. By accessing this commentary, you acknowledge and agree to the terms of this disclaimer.