Your Medical Records Tell the Story of Your Injury

After an accident, your medical records do more than document the treatment you received—they help tell the story of what happened to you and how your injuries have affected you.

For patients, it is important to be open and thorough with your healthcare provider. Tell your provider about all of your symptoms, even if they seem minor, and let them know how your injuries are affecting your daily activities, work, sleep, exercise, and other aspects of your life.

For healthcare providers, clear and consistent documentation is essential.

Recording the patient's complaints, objective findings, functional limitations, treatment provided, and progress over time helps create a complete picture of the injury and recovery process.

Consistent treatment and accurate documentation can be especially important when symptoms continue for an extended period of time. A well-documented medical record can help demonstrate not only that an injury occurred, but also how that injury has impacted the patient's life.

Good communication between the patient and healthcare provider, combined with thorough documentation, helps ensure that the patient's medical story is accurately recorded from the initial injury through recovery.

At Larson Law, we believe that educating both injured individuals and healthcare providers helps make the personal injury process easier to understand and navigate.
