Ever feel like your homeschool curriculum needs divine intervention?

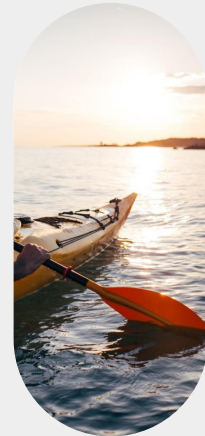

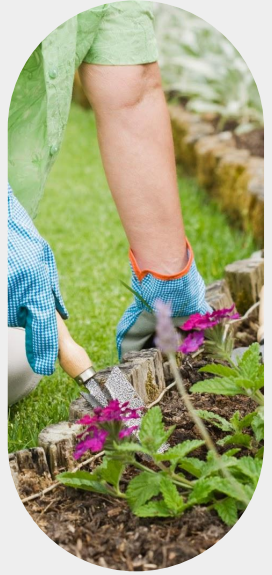

Well, according to EGW, you're not far off! True education isn't just cramming facts into our kids' brains until they overflow at college admission time - it's about the "harmonious development" of body, mind, and spirit. Talk about a challenging lesson plan!

Before sin entered the picture, Adam had the ultimate homeschool setup - face-to-face tutorials with the Creator Himself!
No Pinterest-perfect classroom needed.

Meanwhile, we're over here trying to teach fractions while our students suddenly succumb to selective hearing. But fear not! The goal isn't just preparing kids for earthly success but equipping them for "the higher joy of wider service in the world to come."

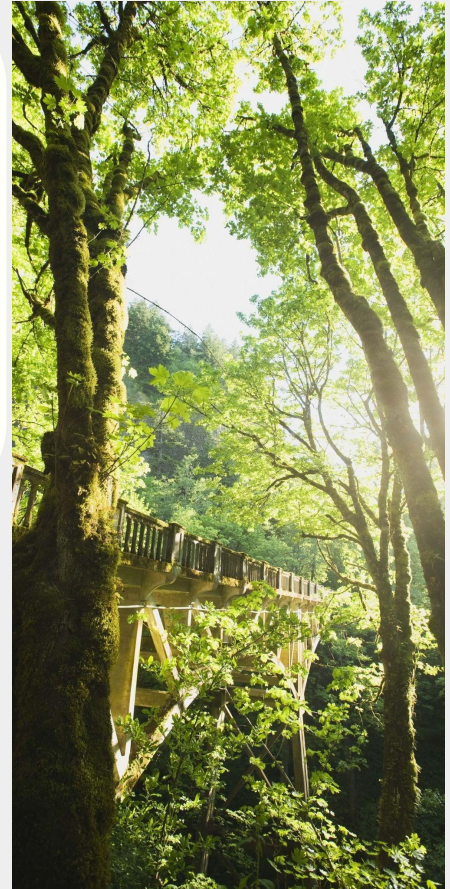

When your student asks,
"When will I ever use algebra in real life?"
you can confidently Answer,

"Possibly in eternity!"

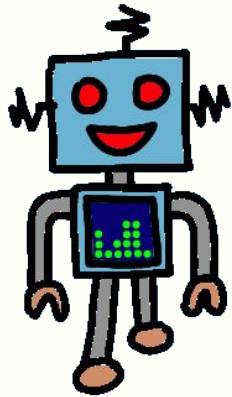

White's educational philosophy suggests we should be raising independent thinkers, not "mere reflectors of other men's thought."

(Similar to those who subscribe to the group F.A.R.M.)

So the next time your student argues with your perfectly reasonable instructions, just smile and say, "I'm not programming a robot—

We're developing character!"

Remember, we're aiming for nothing less than "godlikeness," a standard slightly more ambitious than getting everyone dressed before noon.

And the best part?

This education "cannot be completed in this life"—so" when college application time comes around, you can tell your kids not to stress. After all, they've got eternity to finish their education in the heavenly honors program!
