

Can Primary Care Thrive Outside of Traditional Healthcare Players?

Recent failures in the retail health space beg the question: Is primary care only suited to remain within traditional players? Four healthcare executives shared their responses to this question during a panel at HLTH in Las Vegas.

The past couple of years have been rocky for companies looking to disrupt the traditional primary care model — with top retailers Walmart and Walgreens announcing that they're winding down their primary care operations significantly. Others still stand, though the jury is out on whether they can master the tough unit economics that come along with healthcare delivery.

Recent failures in the retail health space beg the question: Is primary care only suited to remain within traditional players, such as health systems, physician practices and large employers? Four healthcare executives shared their responses to this question during a Sunday panel at HLTH in Las Vegas.

More Than Half Of U.S. Employees Regret Their Open Enrollment

With open enrollment around the corner it's time for many working Americans to start making benefits selections for the upcoming year. A new study by Equitable, a leading financial services organization, found that more than half of Americans eligible for workplace benefits through their employer regret their choices made during last year's open enrollment period.

While open enrollment typically offers employees a two-week window during which they can make benefits selections, the study found that the average amount of time Americans spent making these choices last year ranged from only 30-60 minutes. In comparison, the average American spends nearly two hours on social media every day.
