Nation's Report Card shows Catholic Schools performing at a high level

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — “As the years go by, we’re going to look back and it’s going to be shown more and more that we made the right decision to be in school,” Vince Cascone, superintendent of archdiocesan schools. He was referring to the benefits of the in-person learning offered by archdiocesan schools during the 20-21 school year as compared to school systems that continued with distance learning. His prediction is already bearing

“Although Catholic school students experienced a statistically significant five-point drop in grade [eight] math,” it continued, “Catholic school students’ average scores remained 15 points higher than the average scores of their grade [eight] public school peers.” Cascone believes there are multiple reasons for the success. A major one was the willingness of educators to open their schools in the fall of 2020 to in-person learning despite the unknowns surrounding COVID. “They did it willingly,” he said, “and they did it because deep down they knew that was what was best for the students.”
