

The best wild camping spot was on the Nullarbor crossing on top of the 60-metre high Bunda Cliffs. I will never forget the spectacular views over the Great Southern Ocean and the magnificent cliffs at sunset. There were only two other cars, and they kept a respectable distance from us as we were the first ones to set up camp. A nice young man was using a drone and took footage of us. He kindly gave us a copy of stills from the video. I still pinch myself! Look at it: We were on the edge of the world with nothing between us and Antarctica. It was surreal.

Showgrounds

We found out that almost every single little town has land dedicated to their agricultural shows. Many towns open them to campers when there are no events in progress. These can be wonderful. We have been in a few where there was nobody else around except the caretaker who came to collect the fee, normally between $5 to $35 per night. Some showgrounds are strictly cash only and no receipt. You do wonder where the money ends up. The bigger ones accept credit cards and provide a receipt.
