

The Financial Tsunami

Seemingly way back, long ago, on the Friday evening of the 20th March 2020, I sat in the corner seat of my local pub, enjoying a last pint of beer before it was forcibly closed. I watched the staff going about their work, I watched the landlord supervising, serving, chatting with the customers, and in the background was the iniquitous television news with the face of Rishi Sunak, the UK Chancellor of the Exchequer, telling us that all was well, that furloughed staff would receive 80% of their salaries, that businesses paying rates would be compensated, that it would last three weeks, that we were saving the vulnerable, the sick and society from a very contagious and deadly disease caused by a very dangerous virus, that all would be well with the world when we emerged from this emergency..... and I wept inside.

Most businesses were either shut down or working from home. A limited number remained open, those considered 'essential', businesses such as food shops. Not even during the first or second World War was the entire business community shut down.

That was then, in March, now is now.

As a qualified accountant with many many years of experience, more than I care to remember, I already, deep down, knew the lies being foisted on us. And today, as my suspicions have been confirmed that the 'official' COVID figures have been shown to be highly manipulated, I still weep for our country (and the world) in the knowledge of the financial tsunami which is going to engulf the UK, and most, if not all, the nations and people around the world over the next few months and years.

Many employees partied during the fine weather of the spring and early summer here in the UK. "Yippeeee," I heard them say, as they relaxed in the sunshine. But something deeply sinister was fomenting in the background, an unsettling force, unknown to many of them. The businesses, their employers, were running out of money. It was clearly going to happen. Accordingly, the owners of those businesses sought, and still seek, for ways to save outgoings as the customers melted away, as their markets dried up. One man's spending is another man's income. That is one of the basic facts of life, seemingly unknown to the government advisers and the MPs on their nice safe salaries.

And the financial tsunami was forming itself over the horizon, relentlessly, hidden to most, malevolent, like a massive hurricane forming out of sight to sea, ready to unleash itself on us.

One of my clients spoke to me about his conversation with a British Airways pilot who lived nearby. Oh, how he was loving being furloughed, the best thing since sliced bread. As my client was relating the story to me, I wondered how this fellow would change his tune as the redundancies were announced. And announced they would be. And now, of course, announced they have been. And it is not just BA pilots. It is all sorts of jobs working in the travel industry, the retail industry, the hospitality industry and all the industries reliant on those sectors, and more.

One man's spending is another man's income, do not forget.

The financial tsunami is now visible on the horizon, thundering our way. The furlough scheme is coming to an end, financial support for small businesses is at an end, and the number of redundancies is only now being announced daily in the news' headlines. And to an 'old salt' accountant like myself, it comes as no surprise whatsoever, sadly for those many staff who have lost their jobs.

The three months' mortgage holidays are ending, the landlord eviction protection is now ending, and the full ferocity of the tsunami is approaching. As the thousands of people who now face job losses get behind with their mortgages and rents, they will face homelessness. As the thousands who have not kept, and possibly now cannot keep, on top of their credit card and loan borrowings, they will face court action and possible bankruptcy. As the thousands of small and medium businesses who have been compulsorily shut down by a weak government and their own criminally corrupt advisers - those with financial interests funded mainly by the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation – those small and medium businesses will now be facing winding up proceedings, and those business owners will watch aghast as the kings of the Internet, the Bill Gates, the Zuckerberg, the Bezos and a host of others, enrich themselves by billions of pounds.

And remember, one man's spending is another man's income.

As thousands upon thousands of ordinary job losses become millions, their spending will decline, resulting in others' incomes declining, and so it will go on.

Eventually, as the food supply chains start to break down, the cost of food will rise in proportion to the shortages.

And curiously, it is noted that there are many reports of food suppliers' employees failing COVID-19 tests, resulting in them all being laid off and isolated and the factories being forcibly closed. Coincidence? I fear not as the clue rests with the investments by the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation seeding financially the experimental companies with their new 'meat not made of meat' plants, their artificial growing of 'meat'. It is almost as if the old industries are deliberately being targeted and destroyed to channel consumerism into the new Gates' Foundation world of artificial food. You will have to decide for yourself.

And finally, as the Rothschild printing of new money to fuel the unprecedented level of government spending continues, and the level of public debt reaches eye watering levels never seen before, the financial tsunami will manifest itself in another direction, an altogether sinister and uncontrollable one.

Inflation - the likes we have never seen before in the UK, or more properly called hyperinflation.

This has been seen before in 1920s Germany, and the population headed towards fascism several years later. The insidious cancer underlying the financial tsunami headed our way, and all the fault of an invisible virus. Actually, to be completely accurate, the fault of Big Pharma, the World Health Organisation and its corrupt funders, the weak-minded politicians, and the government advisers (in the UK, USA and other countries) who have all got financial interest totalling billions.

Coincidence? Well, I'll leave that for you to decide.
