NIGERIAN CITY OF LAGOS IS TIFF'S THEME THIS YEAR

By Peter Uduehi

The just-conclude Toronto International Film Festival explored themes in African culture through the big screen this year featuring the Nigerian movie industry known as Nollywood.

Zeroing on the Nigerian city of Lagos as part of its yearly "city to city" theme, six produce-and-made-in-Nigeria films were on hand for moviegoers who came away with new insights to Nigerian and African traditions, mores, customs and ways of life. They also peered into the growing tide of women filmmakers and directors as Africans diversify their economies away from old habits.

"Okafors Law," one of the films directed by Omoni Oboli (a prolific female director), explored the attitude of the Nigerian man's sense of entitlement to sleep with former lovers in this dramatic and gripping, yet audacious postulation that once a man has slept with a woman, he will always sleep with her forever even after a break-up or dissolution of their marriage. Another much-talked about Nigerian screening, "The Wedding Party", produced by another female Mo Abudu, who titillated her audience with a romantic comedy for the ages, African style. TIFF also delved into Mali, another West African country this year, in a movie directed by the German Lutz Gregor in a picturesque summation of the battle to eradicate Islamists who continue to cause chaos across west and north Africa, opting for Sharia law and forbidding women from taking part in music production.

Pictures Top to Bottom: Omoni Oboli, Ufuoma Mcdermott, and Rita Dominic. They were all available for Q and A's.
