How they were invented

- Bite-sized pieces of chicken, coated in batter and then deep fried, were called "Chicken Crispies" by Baker and his associates. Two problems the meat industry was facing at the time were being able to clump ground meat without a skin and producing a batter coating that could be both deep fried and frozen without becoming detached. Baker's innovations solved these problems and made it possible to form chicken nuggets in any shape by first coating the meat in vinegar, salt, grains, and milk powder to make it hold together and then using an egg- and grain-based batter that could be fried as well as frozen.

The image features a dense, textured background of numerous 3D question marks. Most of these question marks are dark grey or black, creating a complex, almost abstract pattern. In the center of the image, a single question mark stands out prominently. This central question mark is a vibrant orange color and is slightly larger and more upright than the others. Overlaid on this orange question mark is the text "Any questions?" in a clean, white, sans-serif font. The lighting is dramatic, with highlights on the edges of the question marks, giving them a three-dimensional appearance. The overall composition suggests a theme of inquiry, questions, or a quiz.
