From the CEO Jayson Scott is the Grandson or the late Art Lacey, the original pilot of the Gas Station Bomber. He grew up in the family business and alongside this B-17 Flying Fortress that is known around the world. It was his inspiration that convinced the family to look at this aircraft differently. It was more than a canopy for their gas station; it was a rare historical treasure that needed to be preserved for future generations.

The story of the Lacey Lady, like the war she represents, includes episodes of drama, narrow escapes, bravery, and even humor. My grandfather, Art Lacey, rescued this B-17G from the military scrap yard in Altus, Oklahoma and somehow managed to fly it to Oregon in 1947. Family lore suggests he did it for two reasons. First, he thought a bomber would make a great—if not eyebrow-raising — canopy for his gas station. Second, a friend bet him $5.00 it couldn't be done. Suffice to say, my grandfather raised more than a few eyebrows and his friend lost the bet.

As a canopy, the plane did its job admirably. But after nearly 70 years of harsh Oregon winters and assaults from birds and vandals, the Lacey Lady was exhausted. One could almost hear her sigh of relief as she was dismantled and taken to a restoration hangar at Salem's McNary Field.

Restoring a 70-year-old plane to airworthy condition creates a unique set of challenges. There simply are no replacement parts available for a B-17 Bomber. Engineers, mechanics, and machinists work from Boeing's original blueprints to reconstruct many of the parts needed. Thanks to their time and effort many sections of this Flying Fortress are being restored.

While these accomplishment are encouraging it also reminds us of how much more there is to do. The B-17 is a massive aircraft. Its wingspan is more than 103 feet; its length exceeds 75 feet. The wing area alone is more than 1400 square feet. Before the Lacey Lady can be declared airworthy, every square inch must be disassembled, carefully inspected, and then repaired or restored to precise specifications. There is no room for error.

Community support is strong and growing. Crew members donated more than 11,000 hours in 2019. Crew leaders are evolving and teams are forming with a goal of a 5 day work week by year end. There are many areas of need. Your support makes a difference. Whether you donate, volunteer or share our mission, we welcome your help.

Please stay in touch and share your experience with others.
