Good afternoon/evening everyone!

As each of us settle into new rhythms at 3 Visions Farm, there's the ever present cascade of work in the beds. The past day or so has given us a break in the unnatural sweltering heat that's given rise to many fires across the states. Even from my secondary work location, I witnessed a trail of smoke creeping behind the hills in the distance. It reminded me of California but here, it feels strange. It should be mild as it is today; low 70s and yet we get several days of 90s coming up shortly.

There was an article I stumbled upon a few days ago where a farmer said that the ground temperature cooked his walla walla onions to mush. It killed his seeds in the dirt. As we're planting fall crops, we're trying to protect the potential of the seedlings with hay, garden fabric, water and cloth. They're going to need some shade to stave off the worst of the heat in their most vulnerable time. We hope it'll be enough to weather them through the next while until they gain enough strength to push through.

Heat aside, we've had incredible success with the summer bed which will start giving in mass very soon. Sungold tomatoes tempt us with their turning clusters and that one krim we're watching is nearly a pound. And that's just one of them. Some raccoon has gotten the memo on the beans though as we've noticed evidence of a stumble when it tried to climb into the bed. It's hilarious but something we're going to be carefully addressing. We've got plenty to share but we need a chance to pick too!

Just look at the poor smushed beans

Another video drop will be coming out today to show off our first lovely onion picking and our raccoon mishap. Next week we'll show you what's been keeping our baskets busy so we're definitely looking forward to sharing with you again!
