Survey seeks spending ideas for Micron money

As part of Micron Technology's plans to come to Central New York, the computer chip maker and New York state have committed to spend $500 million in community and workforce development over the next 20 years.

Now they want to know: What's the best way to spend it?

The Micron Community Engagement Committee is asking the public for input.

The group has a online survey (tinyurl.com/micron-community-survey) that lets people rank a range of issues as top priorities.

The choices include health care, housing, small business support, workforce development, education and child care.

The short survey also asks how much of an impact Micron's arrival in Central New York would have on them personally and how respondents feel about the economy in Central New York.

The community engagement committee will help guide how the money is spent. Elizabeth Doran
