"There's something deeply humiliating about being haunted. Not just by spirits, demons, or things that crawl out from under beds—but by grief, by trauma, by pain, by any kind of invisible affliction that makes you different, uncertain, or broken in the eyes of others.

Society doesn't know what to do with those of us who suffer in strange ways. So it teaches us, silently and early, to carry it alone. If you're mentally ill, you hide it. If you're physically disabled, you minimize it. If your house is haunted, you damn well better keep that to yourself."
