Jim,

general I believe your numbers seem very reasonable. We'll see roughly 90-92 nights per year on the average deluxe cabin but that incorporates both year-round and seasonal park averages. RV pull-thru sites at 35% occupied seems reasonable as well. At $3500/year on the annuals does that include any utilities?

You may end up producing a bit more in the store if merchandised appropriately. It seems like you'll be a substantial distance from other stores so campers will have to purchase goods from your store, correct? The rest actually looks pretty good.

Respectfully,

Chris Fairlee

Good morning, Chris...

Haven't been able to get my head up from the desk in working on the investor package all week. Cancelled my trip to Arizona. It just keeps going and going, trying to get things as correct as possible.

I need to push through this one area as I button up the numbers: Can you confirm broadly, what a typical vacancy rate might be for a seasonal RV campground park? Bearing in mind we're going to be heavily promoting the recreational component of our project, we're hoping to capture a good deal of millennials to extend our season, as they make us their destination.

We realize every park is unique (averages based on the park's rates and location, etc), but for our projections, we're wanting to use a 20% occupancy, 80% vacancy average for all rentable sites.

This means RV pull throughs might be 35% occupied, while luxury cabins 15%.

Would you think these numbers are fairly reasonable? Conservative? If you're unable to answer due to concerns over influencing investor decision, I would not quote you, or might you refer us to a source where we can get some comfort in our assumptions?

Thank you, Jim
