March is here, and I am officially ready for sunshine, lighter jackets, and temperatures that don't involve shoveling. We survived two snowstorms in three weeks anywhere from a foot and a half to over two feet of snow, and let me tell you, the snow days and delayed openings completely wrecked my carefully planned writing schedule.

Since I work a day job and run on a pretty strict routine, surprise schedule changes = chaos. So yes... February was a little challenging when it came to focusing on writing. (Understatement of the year.)

BUT — good news — I'm halfway through my current work in progress, and I'm loving it. The story is flowing, the characters are cooperating (mostly), and I'm excited to keep going.

I also challenged myself to read 24 books in 2026... and I'm already at about 11. Which probably explains why my writing progress occasionally looks like: reading instead of writing 😂.

Another win? My daughter's long cheer season is finally over, which means more time together and hopefully more consistent writing time for me.

And somehow In The Dark is still selling, which honestly blows my mind. Usually after a few months, especially without a big marketing team, things slow down. But word of mouth has been amazing, and I feel so grateful. If you haven't grabbed a copy yet, it's available on Amazon, Barnes & Noble, and other major booksellers in the U.S. and Europe.

March goal: finish this book. So please send prayers, good vibes... and warmer weather.

Thanks for being here and cheering me on it means everything.

With love,
Lu Gonzalez
