What's the Appeal?

Builds on the popular and financially successful genre of movies in which innocent players (buddies, sometimes) are subject to abject torture before turning the tables on their tormentors. The twist on the end breaks the mold – the tortured protagonists don't seek revenge against their tormentors, instead they claim a life-changing prize for surviving their tribulations and proving their mettle.

A superb opportunity to cast paraplegic and blind actors, providing opportunities for publicity and endorsements, given the disabled protagonists prevail in the end despite impediments.

Combines two audience favorites: the sadistic imprisonment plot, along with the buddy movie trope.

Expense benefits from small cast, limited locations, contemporary setting, no special FX.

Story

Dick, a disabled veteran in a wheelchair ends up locked in an abandoned restroom stall after being poisoned at a truck stop diner. He suffers a barrage of disgusting treatments before discovering the presence in the restroom of another imprisoned man, Arthur, a blind black veteran. Dick later discovers the corpse of a man in an adjoining stall who Arthur confirms was deaf. They conclude disability is a common thread in their detention.

Unable to get out, the men bond over their shared military experiences and determine to collaborate on an escape plan. Aware that they are being monitored, Dick and Arthur struggle to communicate their ideas until they discover each speaks Arabic from their fighting days in the Middle East.

Dick fakes his suicide; Arthur helps sell the ruse to the tormentors. Prepared with crude weapons he fashioned inside the stall, Dick overtakes a guard who comes with a power saw to cut open the stall and retrieve his body. Dick uses the saw to free Arthur and the two bolt back out to the diner, chased by more armed guards. In an exhibit of teamwork, Arthur carries crippled Dick, and Dick calls out directions to blind Arthur.

Back in the diner, Dick and Arthur are greeted by several members of an altruistic consortium funding medical research. Having determined that the two men proved worthy, the leader of the consortium offers them a chance to have their disabilities reversed. Skeptical at first – and hungering for revenge – the men accept. A year later both men tee up on a golf course. Dick can walk and Arthur can see.

Synopsis

Confined to a wheelchair, Dick pulls his van into a 24-hour gas station after a long day of traveling, and on the recommendation of the attendant, enters the nearby restaurant for dinner. He encounters numerous violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act on his way to a table. The Waiter recommends the special: a dish called Chicken Goonya.

After finishing dinner, Dick suffers an urgent need to go to the bathroom. Unable to fit into the restaurant bathroom, the Waiter escorts him to a shuttered motel in the back which has a handicap stall. Thankfully, Dick makes it on time – barely. Relieved and ready to depart, he finds himself locked in the stall, as he has broken off the handle in his rush to the toilet.

Before Dick can determine an exit plan, a number of crude and vile things happen just outside his stall. He makes a call for help but a sudden blackout disorients Dick and he drops his cell phone into the backed-up toilet. His attempt at retrieval is decidedly grim – and futile. He calls out for help. A fellow inmate, Arthur, replies it's no use. Arthur has been stuck in his stall for three days, and has no idea why. He notes that because he's blind, he's uncertain of the length of his forced stay.

Dick and Arthur explore theories on their predicament, and slowly establish a bond – as both were avid golfers and later veterans who acquired their injuries in the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. Eventually, the men devise a means of communicating without detection by the captors. Later, while Dick and Arthur sleep fitfully, the captors deliver more Chicken Goonya. The men revolt, with Dick pushing his plate back out of the stall with a pile of fresh crap upon it. Offended, the guy delivering the food sloshes bleach onto the plate and into Dick's stall. Dick sops up the bleach with his sweater in a gambit to escape.

Dick plans to fake his death by hanging, and when someone comes for him, he'll make a surprise attack. Dick has fashioned a shiv from a sharp piece of broken porcelain toilet tank lid. After Arthur calls out that Dick has killed himself, a guard enters wielding a power saw to cut open Dick's locked stall. As the guard cuts, Dick hastily urinates on the sweater creating a chemical reaction of poisonous phosgene. Once the guard enters the stall, Dick overtakes him with the soaked sweater. He stabs a second guard with the porcelain shard, and forces the gassed guard to piggyback him to Arthur's stall. Using the saw, Dick frees Arthur, and the two make an escape. Arthur can't see and Dick can't run. They must collaborate to escape.

The duo make their way to the restaurant where they encounter all the people who were in the restaurant that day they first stepped inside. One of them introduces himself as the chairman of a group of altruistic investors. He explains that the group is focused on conducting research and development to reverse debilitating handicaps.

Disturbed by the notion that these wealthy people used torture to cull disabled candidates down to a pair of worthy beneficiaries, Dick and Arthur push back on the offer to heal. But in the end, they accept.

Months later, Dick and Arthur tee it up on a golf course, completely healed and ready to get in 18.
