How to Buy Local Meat

- Call or message first. Most farms sell by appointment and run out between batches. Ask what is in stock and when you can pick up.
- Buying in bulk saves money. Many farms sell a quarter, half or whole animal. The price is usually based on hanging weight (the carcass weight before cutting), so the meat you take home weighs less than that number. Ask whether processing is included.
- Plan your freezer space. One Culpeper farm (Liberty Hall) estimates a quarter beef at about 125 lb (4 cubic feet of freezer), a half at about 275 lb (7 cubic feet) and a whole at 450 to 600 lb (14 or more cubic feet). Another (Anchor Mere) says a half can be 140 to 220 lb and suggests bringing 2 to 3 large coolers.
- Ask about processing. Which butcher do they use, is it USDA-inspected, and how long is the beef hung or dry-aged? You may get to fill out a cut sheet choosing steak thickness, roasts or more ground beef, and package size.
- Order early. Bulk beef and pork often sell out. Some farms take orders in spring for fall processing and ask for a deposit.
- Grass-finished or grain-finished? Farms here offer both. Grass-finished beef is leaner; grain-finished usually has more marbling. Ask which the farm sells.
- Keep it frozen. A chest freezer set at 0 degrees F keeps vacuum-sealed meat in good shape for months.
