

To Start

I am reminded of a statement by a person I have been so grateful to learn from who said: "Know what you believe and why you believe it".

I will start with a book to read, because I could say it was a certain starting point for me. At least a starting point to want to research and write or document my thoughts and feelings not only for myself but for others like me.

"Celtic Christianity: Deep Roots for a Modern Faith" by Ray Simpson. It was what I was looking for although I did not know I was looking for it specifically. It always happens that way though, not looking for a specific thing but these little paths lead you right where you needed, wanted and mostly already knew where you were going, just to affirm your belief(s) even more.

It not only affirmed that there are others like me, but that there really are MANY others, like me out there, looking for real truth. It only made me want more. It's not like it talks about so much that a person doesn't already know or believe, but just made simple sense in simple words showing how simple the truth really is, along with some great history.

It's also a start because I have never done this and I am new to actually writing things down as far as a blog, journal or book and is something I've wanted to do for a long time. I have 40 years of thoughts I want to write down now after such vast changes in my lifetime, in science, in the spiritual and religious world and our fast-paced technological societies.

I guess to start, I'm fed up with the typical American evangelical movement(s) (among so many other things). as a mother, wife, daughter, sister, artist, scientist, philosopher, animal lover and owner, business owner, genealogist, christian-syncretist-and-mystic [currently for lack of a better word] capricorn (sun), leo (moon), virgo (rising) and empath, I feel like we as a human race are missing out on so much more that our creator really wanted us to find in creation and yes I do believe as well, through ancient teachings. As they say the devil is in the details, yes, and iI think we have missed the real meat, dwelling and focusing on DETAILS...

My character and personality work best with a challenge or just a problem to solve. So, until I write again, if anyone reads this or has a comment, please get it to me so as to get me going...
