A Real-Life Story Comes from Close Sources

A Run to Hell is not just another Literature & Fiction novel. It is shaped by real events, real people, and inside knowledge that came to the author from close sources.

In the East Falls section of Philadelphia, Frederick Schofield's father grew up next door to same-aged and forever friend Grace Kelly and her brother Kell.

He knew the brash young lady before Hollywood created the sophisticated image that carried Grace to Oscar winning stardom and royalty as Princess of Monaco.

Grace's fate also fell on her brother, Jack "Kell" Kelly, a prominent Philadelphia City Council person and President of the U.S. Olympic Committee. The press labeled his long-time companion, Rachel Harlow, as "Philadelphia's famous transsexual." Years before LGBTQIA+ support, Harlow regularly appeared in print and on nationally broadcasted TV. Together they were the couple to liven up any dinner party.

A different slice of humanity also offered insights: lawyer Frederick Schofield's clientele and mob associates. Some whispered, knowing how fate snuffed Grace and her family members . . . and how drug dealings functioned in dysfunctional dictator Manuel Noriega's Panama. And Schofield's mentor in the criminal law, Raymond J. Takiff, defended dictator Noriega in Florida courtrooms for shipping mountains of Medellin Cartel cocaine to the United States through his Panama canal.

The book follows criminal lawyer Lee Gunther and FBI special agent Jaime Calero. Both carry deep wounds from traumatic pasts. They join a mission that puts everything, especially their lives, at risk. The story races to exotic locales: South Philadelphia to Monaco, Miami, the Everglades, the Baja Peninsula of Mexico, and Panama. Tension builds as characters struggle to cast off demons from their past, while fighting to stay alive.
