Good Morning Sharon –

In Connecticut, parents who homeschool are doing so under Connecticut General Statutes (C.G.S.) Chapter 168 Section 10-184 which states that the parent is providing the child with “equivalent instruction”. There is no mention of any responsibility at the state or district level for signing off that the individual homeschooled child’s learning process has aligned with that requirement, or to attest that the homeschooled child has successfully completed a particular grade, which is what is being asked here. We cannot provide that authentication or sign off on a homeschooling report card.

The Department of Education does not accredit any of the online or homeschooling institutions, and the local school districts bear no responsibility for review or authentication of homeschooling documentation.

When a homeschooling parent is moving to another state or country, the responsibility for review of the homeschooling documentation falls to the school in which the child will be enrolled.

Please communicate with your child’s new school to learn what they wish from you as the child’s educator in order to provide a successful placement.

Best,

Marcy

Good morning, Sharon Degnan,

In your email below, you have mentioned "Homeschooling." If "Homeschooling" had been referenced in your email of November 17, 2024, I would have provided a different response to assist you.

In my email of November 19, 2024, I informed you that "your email of November 17, 2024, did not provide any information, nor did you provide the referenced email as to the actual circumstances or issues concerning an unsigned school report card."

Please know that your email still has not provided any details or information as to why there is a denial of signing a Homeschooling report card.
