

One Dark World

Huge amounts of blood fell off my hands into the void in front of me. My body trembled as I heard the sounds of the creature's roars way behind me, wanting to turn around so bad. My only choice was to jump into the dark pit in front of me, but that'd be "fucking stupid" I thought to myself. But, this may be my only choice, my only chance of possibly making it out of this hell. I couldn't resist the urge to turn around, so I did. There it was, running right my way. And holy shit was this beast fast. As it kept running and running, I slowly backed up almost falling into the pit before I stopped myself. Seems that I was still too scared to do something that dense. Now, hallucinations or not, the more the monster got closer, the more darker this world I saw became. It was now too close to me, I was petrified in fear on if I'd die or not. I made the choice. I jumped into the hole, right before it almost snatched me.

"Oh shiiiiii~" As it felt like I was screaming for hours on end, I finally fell onto some sort of sandy ground. But the sand was dark and very wet. My surroundings looked the same too, same structures, and everything. Thing is, this place may have looked the same, but it sure as hell didn't feel the same. It didn't feel as near as empty as the other world, or maybe this was the same world but a different area. Many different thoughts went throughout my head, but one question was more crucial than the others, "Was that thing I saw in that other place here as well?" I double checked my surroundings being paranoid as I was. It definitely felt like something was watching me from the dark. A shadowy figure would pass a corner of a building every now and then or I'd see one watching me from a window, but it'd suddenly vanish as soon as I noticed it.

Tick tock, tick tock. Sounds of a grandfather clock was heard strangely enough from the sky. "What in the-" I stopped mid-sentence, as there it was again... but taller. Every time I heard the clock went off, its smile grew more noticeable, and bigger. It took one singular step and was already too close for my comfort. "You." Its eyes darted towards mine. "You aren't supposed to be here." Another step was taken and it was directly in front of me. I noticed its arm reaching out for me, so I ran as fast as I could to get away from the abomination of a creature it was. The world around me became darker as I saw it for what it really was. The trees I passed had bodies hung on the branches and the buildings seemed to be severely damaged from some sort of outbreak. "You did this." It spoke to me again once more, trying to fill my mind with deception. I found the dark pit again, I looked back one more time, but it was gone this time. Thinking to myself, I didn't care that it was gone, I still went in anyway. This time, there were no buildings, no nature, nothing. Just darkness this time. But there it was again, staring at me. "Guess there was no escape from you then huh? And seems that you brought your friends with you too... interesting."